In characterizing his own brand of Critical Philosophy, Cassirer divides the symbolic forms into groups, each of which relates (in a transcendental sense) to a different mode of being. From this point of view, myth, art, language and science appear as symbols. . . in the sense of forces each of which produces and posits a world of its own (p. 8).

Review of Ernst Cassirer, Language and Myth

Cassirer rejects such fictionalism in myth and language both as an appeal to psychologistic measures of truth that fail to see a better alternative in the philosophy of symbolic forms. For Cassirer, myth (and language, discussed below) does reflect reality: the reality of the subject.
